INTRODUCTION

The Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000 (the 2000 Act) came into force on 2 April 2001. The new Act amends the Race Relations Act 1976 (the 1976 Act) and strengthens its application to public authorities in several important ways:

- it extends the scope of the 1976 Act to cover areas that were previously excluded, and makes it unlawful for public authorities to discriminate on racial grounds in carrying out any of their functions
- it places a general statutory duty on a wide range of public authorities (see Appendix 1) to promote racial equality and prevent racial discrimination
- it gives the Home Secretary the power to make Orders imposing specific duties on all or some public authorities bound by the general duty – Scottish Ministers can impose specific duties on devolved authorities; these specific duties will be enforceable by the Commission for Racial Equality (CRE), serving compliance notices, backed up by court orders, if necessary
- it gives the CRE powers to issue statutory codes of practice, providing practical guidance to public authorities on how to fulfil both their general and specific duties to promote racial equality.

This booklet is not an authoritative statement of the law. It has been produced to help public authorities understand the implications of the 2000 Act for them and, in particular, to help them to comply with their new general duty to promote racial equality, pending the introduction by the CRE of statutory codes of practice toward the end of 2001.

As the general duty is best understood within the context of race relations legislation as a whole, this guidance includes a summary of the main provisions of the 1976 Act, as amended by the 2000 Act. It also includes some information on the specific duties (subject to Home Office consultation until 15 May 2001) and the statutory CRE codes of practice.

Both the 2000 Act and the 1976 Act can be downloaded from the Home Office website: www.homeoffice.gov.uk/raceact/welcome.htm

Background

The 1976 Act remains the basic law in Great Britain that defines and outlaws racial discrimination, and that gives individuals the right to seek legal redress for acts of racial discrimination. The 1976 Act also established the CRE, with powers to investigate and take enforcement action.

The Stephen Lawrence Inquiry Report, published in February 1999, has been a catalyst for much needed change. While the Inquiry was concerned primarily with policing, the report made it clear that few institutions in Britain had room for complacency.

The report put forward a definition of ‘institutional racism’* that could be applied to any institution, and recommended that:

it is incumbent upon every institution to examine their policies and the outcome of their policies and practices to guard against disadvantaging any section of our communities [Stephen Lawrence Inquiry Report, para 46.27].

Some public authorities have responded positively to the report’s recommendation, or to other government or departmental initiatives, voluntarily auditing their functions and adopting measures to promote racial equality. Disappointingly, however, the majority have taken little or no action.

The new positive duty on public authorities to promote racial equality gives statutory force to the Lawrence Inquiry’s recommendation; it makes compulsory what voluntary measures have been unable fully to achieve. Compliance with this duty will make public authorities more effective, efficient, transparent and accountable and will help them to win the confidence and cooperation of the public they exist to serve, and on whom they depend for support.

* The inquiry defined ‘institutional racism’ as ‘the collective failure of an organisation to provide and appropriate and professional service to people because of their colour, culture or ethnic origin. It can be seen or detected in processes, attitudes and behaviour which amount to discrimination through unwitting prejudice, ignorance, thoughtlessness and racist stereotyping which disadvantages minority ethnic people’ [para 6.34].

1. RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

What is racial discrimination?

Racial discrimination may be either direct or indirect.

- Direct discrimination occurs when a person (including a company or a public authority), on racial grounds, treats someone less favourably than others in similar circumstances. Racial grounds are grounds of colour, race, nationality (including citizenship) or ethnic or national origin.

Examples

- refusing to serve Asian clients
  - ignoring racial harassment of tenants or employees
  - requiring only black patients to produce their passports before they can receive hospital treatment
  - assuming that all black prisoners are aggressive and therefore subjecting them to harsher discipline than white prisoners.
- Indirect discrimination occurs when a condition or requirement which is applied equally to everyone can be met by a considerably smaller proportion of people from a particular racial group, and it is to their disadvantage because they cannot comply with it. The condition or requirement will be unlawful unless it can be justified on non-racial grounds. Under the Act, a racial group is a group of people defined in terms of colour, race, nationality (including citizenship) or ethnic or national origin.

Example

The catchment area for a popular school where nearly all the pupils are white is drawn so that it excludes an estate with a high proportion of ethnic minority families, as well as a nearby road where there is a hostel for asylum seekers. The line on the local map is, of course, race neutral, but its impact is to deny many ethnic minority children entry to the school, and without a non-racial justification it will be unlawful.

Victimisation occurs when a person is treated less favourably than others for having made, or supported, a complaint of racial discrimination.

When is racial discrimination unlawful?

The 1976 Act makes it unlawful to discriminate on racial grounds in employment and training, in housing and education and in the provision of goods, facilities or services. It applies to all sectors: public, private and voluntary.

Section 1 of the 2000 Act adds a new section, 19B, to the 1976 Act, outlawing racial discrimination in public authority functions that were not covered by the original Act, such as:

- use by the police of stop and search powers
- collection of taxes
- regulation of street trading
- investigation of benefit fraud
- inspections of residential care homes
- detention of mentally ill patients.

Under section 19B, a 'public authority' is defined to include 'any person certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature'. This means that if public functions included under section 19B are carried out by a private or voluntary organisation, for example under a contract or a service level agreement, it is also unlawful for that organisation to discriminate on racial grounds when carrying out those functions.

Example

A private security firm has a contract with the Home Office to escort remand prisoners to and from courts. When it is escorting prisoners, the firm is a 'public authority', performing a public function, and will be liable for any racial discrimination that occurs in doing so.

Who is liable for acts of racial discrimination?

The 1976 Act (section 32) makes employers, in both the public and private sectors, vicariously liable for acts of unlawful discrimination by their employees, even if the employers did not approve, or even know about, the acts in question. Since 2 April 2001, this includes chief officers of police, who will be vicariously liable for all acts of discrimination by constables under their control.

Employers will not be liable, however, if they can prove that they took 'such steps as were reasonably practicable' to prevent the discrimination (section 32(3)), such as following the CRE's existing statutory codes of practice in employment and housing, or adopting the CRE's published standards for racial equality in employment, local government and schools (see Appendix 3).

Is there a right of redress against racial discrimination?

Anyone who believes they have suffered racial discrimination through the acts or omissions of a public authority, or a private or voluntary organisation, can bring proceedings under the 1976 Act. Most complaints will be heard either in employment tribunals or county or sheriff courts.

The CRE has power under the amended 1976 Act to conduct formal investigations into any functions of public authorities. This power will continue to apply in relation to private and voluntary organisations.

2. THE GENERAL DUTY TO PROMOTE RACIAL EQUALITY

What is the general duty?

The general duty placed on public authorities is set out in section 71(1) of the amended Act:

Every body or other person specified in Schedule 1A or of a description falling within that Schedule shall, in carrying out its functions, have due regard to the need –

- (a) to eliminate unlawful racial discrimination; and*
- (b) to promote equality of opportunity and good relations between persons of different racial groups.*

To whom does the general duty apply?

Schedule 1A to the amended Race Relations Act lists the public authorities to which the general duty will apply. The list currently includes the larger public authorities (see Appendix 1). The Home Secretary can add or delete authorities by Order and has already proposed certain additions (see Appendix 2).

Responsibility for complying with the duty rests with the authority or body listed in the Schedule; for example the members of a local authority, a school governing body or a health authority or board.

The general duty applies only to the public authorities listed in the Schedule, and they remain responsible for complying with it, even if they have contracted out some of their functions to private or voluntary organisations (see p 14).

What does the general duty mean in practice?

The aim of the general duty is to ‘mainstream’ the elimination of discrimination and the promotion of equality of opportunity and good race relations, by making these an integral part of the way public functions are carried out. It is not a weighty new burden, just a better and more effective way of doing what an authority already does.

‘to have due regard’

By phrasing the general duty in this way, parliament has made it clear that public authorities do not have the option to decide whether they will do anything about discrimination and racial equality. Each public authority should therefore assess where, and how, racial equality is relevant – or potentially relevant – to the way they carry out their various functions. And racial equality will have some, often considerable, relevance for most public functions.

To have ‘due regard’ means that the weight given to racial equality should be proportionate to its relevance. So, for example, a local authority may decide that racial equality is more important in social services provision than in highway maintenance. In some instances, where racial equality has no direct relevance to a public authority’s more technical functions, such as meteorological research or weather forecasting or air traffic control, a court may be satisfied that the general duty will not apply to those functions. The general duty may, however, apply to the way in which information about technical matters is provided to the public.

For all public authorities, regardless of their specific functions, racial equality will always be relevant to all aspects of employment – recruitment, selection, training, promotion, discipline and dismissal. To comply with the general duty, therefore, all authorities should ‘equality proof’ their employment policies, procedures and practice, and take all necessary steps to prevent discrimination.

‘the need to eliminate unlawful discrimination and to promote equality of opportunity and good relations between persons of different racial groups’

All listed public authorities must take these issues into account. In practice, the three parts of this requirement will frequently overlap, depending on the nature of the function: promoting equality of opportunity may also eliminate racial discrimination and promote good race relations.

If one measure does not fulfil all three parts of this requirement, separate measures may be required to satisfy each part.

Examples

- Providing positive action training for a group that is underrepresented in an authority (see p 16) may promote equality of opportunity, but it would not tackle possible discrimination in the authority’s recruitment procedures.
- A local authority which failed to take account of information about recent racist incidents on a council estate before allocating accommodation there to an ethnic minority family would be failing to comply with the requirement in the general duty to promote good race relations.

3. COMPLYING WITH THE GENERAL DUTY

What steps should public authorities take to comply with the general duty?

Public authorities will be responsible for ensuring that the general duty is an integral part of any function where racial equality is relevant. The authority will have to define its functions and then assess the impact on racial equality of what it is currently doing and what it is proposing to do. Where current or proposed policies conflict with the elimination of racial discrimination or the promotion of racial equality and good race relations, a public authority will be expected to consider the changes needed to comply with the general duty, and then make those changes.

Detailed guidance can be found in the CRE's standards for employers, local authorities and schools (see Appendix 3). Posing questions along the lines suggested below should help the authority to identify the measures it needs to take.

1. Which of our functions are covered by the requirements of the general duty?

To answer this, you could, if you have not already:

- a. make a list of all your statutory powers and duties under the relevant legislation
- b. identify those functions which involve the public, or have consequences for them
- c. obtain data on the relevant population, classified by ethnic group, for each function
- d. identify the users, or potential users, of the facilities and services you provide, by ethnic group, and ask whether any of them have particular needs or different priorities
- e. prioritise your functions in order of their impact, or potential impact, on ethnic minorities.

2. How should we measure the impact on racial equality of our policies and procedures, and how they work in practice?

To answer this, you could, if you have not already:

- a. starting with the functions you have prioritised (see 1e above), draw up a list of the aims and objectives of the policies you have adopted for each function
- b. check whether the policies affect all ethnic groups equally; look for any significant disparities between the population data for different ethnic groups and the data on people affected by each policy
- c. establish the reasons for any disparities
- d. set up ethnic monitoring systems, so that you can regularly review the impact on racial equality of the policies you have drawn up for each of your functions – and any changes you make to them.

3. How can we assess the impact on racial equality of policies we are proposing to introduce?

To answer this, you could, if you have not already:

- a. be clear about the aims and objectives behind each proposal
- b. be clear about the groups that are intended to benefit from, or will be affected by, the proposal; for example, changing patterns of police patrols might better meet the needs of one group, while leaving another feeling unprotected
- c. refer to the findings of recent surveys or research by your authority (and others), and check through past complaints and litigation
- d. consult the people who will be affected by your policy – make sure any information you provide is in an accessible form; and use various consultation methods, such as surveys, focus groups, and local meetings.

4. How can we mainstream racial equality into our functions?

To answer this, you could, if you have not already:

- a. starting with the functions you have prioritised (see 1e), and using the methods suggested in 2 and 3 above, review all your policies, procedures and practices – current and proposed – for each function, to see whether they comply with the general duty to promote racial equality and good race relations

- b. identify the different needs of each ethnic group in the relevant population, for each function, and the best ways of meeting these, including positive action measures (see p 16)
- c. consider the changes you will need to make to the policies, procedures or practices you have adopted for each function to ensure that it complies with the general duty (see Appendix 3 for other CRE guidance)
- d. identify possible obstacles to the changes you are planning to make to your policies or procedures, and consider ways of tackling them; it may help to consult further
- e. implement the changes you have identified, including changes to staff management, training, appraisals and discipline, and ensure that everyone concerned with the relevant policies knows what changes have been made, and is able to put the new policies into practice.

5. How can we build racial equality into all aspects of employment in the authority?

To answer this, you could, if you have not already:

- a. carry out an audit of all your employees, by grade, type of contract, pay and other benefits, and by ethnic group
- b. compare the workforce data with data on the population from which you normally recruit, and look for any significant disparities between ethnic groups
- c. check for disparities in the success rates of applicants, internal and external, from different ethnic groups at all stages of the recruitment process
- d. identify possible barriers to equality of opportunity, and consider how they might be removed (see Appendix 3 for other CRE guidance that might be useful)
- e. revise any policy or practice that puts employees or prospective employees from ethnic minorities at a disadvantage
- f. consider using positive action measures to address under-representation of people from particular ethnic groups (see p 16)
- g. review staff management, training, appraisal and discipline, and ensure that any changes you make to your recruitment and selection policies, procedures and practice are understood and implemented throughout the organisation.

Does the general duty apply to private or voluntary organisations carrying out a public authority's functions?

The general duty applies only to public authorities listed in Schedule 1A to the 2000 Act; it does not apply to private and voluntary organisations. However, the general duty does apply to the arrangements that a listed public authority makes for its functions to be carried out by a private or voluntary organisation. The authority should therefore give careful thought to the question of how it is complying with the general duty when it is discharging its functions through others.

The general duty does not override other laws or regulations affecting public procurement. Public authorities listed in Schedule 1A will be expected, within the existing laws, to avoid discrimination and to take appropriate measures to promote racial equality in setting criteria and deciding who should be awarded contracts or grants.

If racial equality considerations are relevant to the functions that are being contracted out, then, as a general rule, it would be appropriate to incorporate non-discrimination and/or racial equality performance standards as obligations under the contract. If such terms are included, the contract should also provide for effective monitoring and enforcement.

How will the general duty affect a public authority's participation in partnerships?

Increasingly, public authorities are encouraged or required to collaborate with other public, private or voluntary sector organisations; for example in social inclusion partnerships, local economic forums, youth offending teams, health action zones and regeneration partnerships.

The general duty applies to the way a public authority listed in Schedule 1A carries out its functions within the partnership. In partnerships where other members of the partnership are also listed public authorities, the general duty will then apply fully to all deliberations, decisions and action by the partnership.

In partnerships where other members are private or voluntary organisations, the listed public authority should ensure that, where relevant, the activities of the partnership comply with the general duty.

How can positive action be used to comply with the general duty?

The 1976 Act permits certain types of ‘positive action’, as described below. Public authorities should consider how they might use these to promote racial equality.

Measures to meet the special needs of a particular racial group (section 35)

It is lawful to make facilities or services available to people from a particular racial group in order to meet their education, training or welfare needs.

Examples

- an outreach scheme to encourage isolated ethnic minority communities to take up benefits
- interpretation services
- English language classes for refugees
- mobile health services for Travellers or Gypsies.

Training and encouragement to tackle under-representation in employment (sections 37 and 38)

It is lawful to provide training for particular racial groups that are under-represented in certain types of work. The Act also allows employers and others to encourage applications for such jobs from under-represented racial groups. It remains unlawful, however, to discriminate in selecting people for the jobs; therefore, to apply a quota or to reserve jobs for under-represented racial groups is unlawful and must not to be confused with lawful positive action measures.

All schemes set up under sections 35, 37 or 38 must be regularly reviewed; if the special needs have been met, or the under-representation no longer exists, positive action may cease to be lawful.

Is the general duty enforceable?

Enforcement by the CRE and the courts

An individual or an organisation, including the CRE, may be able to apply to the High Court for a judicial review of a public authority’s alleged failure to comply with its general duty.

The CRE’s powers of enforcement apply to the specific duties that the Home Secretary and Scottish Ministers impose (see p 18).

Audits and inspections

Agencies responsible for auditing or inspecting public authorities will be expected to include compliance with the general duty as one of the matters they will examine and report on. As these agencies – such as OFSTED, Audit Scotland, Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary and the Social Services Inspectorate – are themselves subject to the general duty, they should be building racial equality measures into their audit or inspection procedures, or strengthening and making more explicit those they already have.

4. SPECIFIC DUTIES, CODES OF PRACTICE AND ENFORCEMENT

What are specific duties?

The 2000 Act (section 71(2)–(3)) empowers the Home Secretary (or, in the case of devolved Scottish authorities, the Scottish Ministers) to impose, by Order, specific duties on all or some of the public authorities listed in Schedule 1A, ‘for the purpose of ensuring the better performance of the general duty’. Authorities will therefore want to ensure that any procedures introduced after 2 April 2001 in order to comply with the general duty also take account of the specific duties likely to be imposed on them. The Home Office consultation document, Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000: New laws for a successful multi-racial Britain, published in February 2001, sets out the specific duties that are proposed for different types of public authorities, and indicates July 2001 as the likely date when Orders imposing specific duties will be made.

What will the CRE codes of practice cover?

The CRE codes of practice will offer practical guidance to public authorities to help them to comply with both the general duty and any specific duties imposed by the Home Secretary or Scottish Ministers. At the time of writing, the CRE is proposing to issue five specific codes of practice – for local authorities, NHS authorities and trusts, educational bodies, police authorities and chief officers of police and central government departments – and a generic code for other public authorities. The CRE will issue equivalent codes in Scotland. Failure to follow a code will not in itself be ground for legal action, but the code will be admissible in evidence if it is relevant to a case that is before a court or tribunal.

Are the specific duties enforceable?

Enforcement by the CRE and the courts

The CRE has the power to enforce the specific duties imposed on listed public authorities once they have come into force (section 71D).

Under the 2000 Act, if the CRE is satisfied that a public authority has failed to comply with any of its specific duties, it may serve a ‘compliance notice’. This notice will require the authority to comply with its specific duties, and to inform the CRE within 28 days of the measures it has taken; the CRE can also require the authority to provide written information verifying compliance.

If, after three months, the authority has not complied with the CRE’s notice, the CRE can ask the county court or sheriff court to order the authority to comply.

Individual complaints

Individuals do not have the right to take legal action against a public authority because it has not fulfilled its specific duties. However, individuals, community organisations, trade unions and others should notify the CRE if they are concerned that a public authority has failed to comply with its specific duties. The CRE would consider how its enforcement powers could be used.
